Armed Conflict and International Law in the Indo-Pacific Region provides a timely and regionally grounded analysis of how international law applies to potential armed conflict in one of the world's most strategically dynamic regions. Adopting a multi-domain approach, the volume explores the legal frameworks governing warfare across land, sea, air, space, cyber, and the information environment, while remaining attuned to the Indo-Pacific's evolving geopolitical landscape.

This book tackles the enduring puzzle of consent-based use of force in international law. Why can force be justified by state consent, and under what conditions is such justification valid? These questions have long been treated separately. This study brings them together through a new theoretical framework that connects theory and practice. Drawing on the humanisation of international law, it reconstructs the principle of non-use of force by integrating a human-centred perspective into the traditional state-to-state model. By doing so, it offers a coherent account of consent-based force and redefines the role of human interests within a fundamentally state-centric legal order.
